Agriculture

The agriculture degree program is for students searching for an interdisciplinary education that builds on the diverse disciplines in the College of Agriculture, Food and Natural Resources (CAFNR). The flexibility of the agriculture degree enables students to tailor a program to fit their individual interests and career goals, whether in production agriculture, life sciences or natural resources. Students earn a Bachelor of Science in Agriculture by choosing three concentration areas from the College's degree programs, minors, and/or certificates to create a unique, tailored program.

Faculty

See listing for faculty in areas of concentration by referring to the specific degree program listings (available under the College of Agriculture, Food and Natural Resources).
